Workshop Summary

Recent national tragedies remind us that the risk is real: an act of violence can happen in any place at any time. An active shooter or any act of violence is a worst case safety scenario for a business or organization. It's hard to believe such a violent situation could arise in a health care setting. The best ways to make sure you stay safe are to prepare ahead of time.

Preparing for an act of violence in a long-term care facility requires a multifaceted approach. Assessing the risk of violence requires a detailed analysis. The risk assessment will facilitate effective policies and plans for response, communication, and recovery. Training staff involves conveying response protocols as well as being attentive to the emotional stress associated with the training and helping staff understand practical methods to protect themselves. The assessment, plans, and training will all be minimized if the organization has no approach to addressing physical, emotional, and operational recovery. This workshop will walk participants through assessing the risk of an act of violence, examine best practices for training staff, and discuss development of comprehensive plans and policies to manage an act of violence in a long-term care facility.
